"Because of efficient protective barriers against diseases originating in foreign lands, the United States is able to maintain and stabilize high standards of animal health," Dr. John O'Harra, vice president of the AVMA, told the American National Cattlemen's Association January 26.

"The job begins at our ocean and border ports of entry, where federal veterinarians carry out quarantine and inspection regulations designed to keep foreign diseases out of the country," he said. "Veterinary inspectors are present at every major air and ocean port where animal by-products may be brought into the country by travelers."

During 1963, 1,275,435 animals entered the United States from foreign countries, Dr. O'Harra stated. If these, 1,232,036 were cattle. "All of them were inspected by veterinarians of the Animal Inspection and Quarantine Division of the Agricultural Research Service," he pointed out. "91,916 animals were rejected, including 81,505 cattle."

Veterinary medicine in the United States has grown to become one of the leading health professions in the country and "either directly or indirectly influences just about every phase of our daily lives," Dr. M. R. Clarkson, president-elect of the AVMA told the Minnesota VMA Jan. 27.

He cited pet care, meat inspection, research, development of drugs and vaccines for use in advancement of animal and human health, laboratory animal medicine, public health, aero-space medicine, and comparative medicine as examples of veterinary medicine's diverse responsibilities in meeting the health needs of the nation.

"Most Americans never give much thought to the work being done by the profession," Dr. Clarkson emphasized. "But when they pause for reflection they realize that they are receiving countless benefits from the skills and efforts of the doctor of veterinary medicine."

The Alabama Farmer, one of the leading farm publications in the country, with a monthly circulation of more than 86,000 readers, recently cited the call of top Alabama farmers for additional assistance from the veterinary medical profession to meet the increasing needs of the United States for more beef cattle.

The magazine revealed the appeals made by prominent Alabama cattlemen including E. H. Wilson, executive vice president of the Alabama Cattlemen's Association, during a veterinary medical short course held at Auburn University in November.

Quoting Mr. Wilson the magazine said that this nation will need 10 million more beef cattle by 1970, and that, in order to reach this goal, the cattle industry will need more help from the veterinary medical profession, especially in the area of preventive medicine.
